Kathy, twenty-four, is the oldest child and the only daughter. She is now a Roman Catholic nun doing graduate study in Dubuque, Iowa. But, like her brothers, she grew up farming, and she still misses it. Kathy called this May during her final exam and said, "I'd give anything to be ploughing instead!" As the youngest, Joel has at times had more farming "teachers" than he's wanted, One night he sat at the kitchen table listening to his dad and brothers talk about the rewards of farming. "It's good, independent life," said Bill. "You're your own boss". "I wouldn't know", said Joel, grinning. "I've got bosses." "Who?" asked his dad. Joel pointed to each one around the table. They all laughed! Joel used to be largely at somebody's side, watching and listening, lending a hand, or going on the run for a tractor or forgotten tool. He took the occasional bossing he got in stride. Now, he is so busy with this own work that he is no longer available to be everybody's "go-fer". "If I had just one word to describe Joel, it would be enthusiasm," says Betty. He uses his youthful energy indiscriminately. On one summer day, he jumped 15 fences, drove farm machinery 25 miles, fed 320 animals, opened and closed 8 gates, walked and ran about 8 miles, jumped on and off the tractor 26 times, lifted 900 pounds of grain, shovelled 4,000 pounds, ate about 2600 calories! On weekends and during the summer, Joel works outdoors anywhere from eight to fifteen hours a day. The only time he minds it is during early spring. Then the snow melts and rain often pours down daily, turning the farmyard into a swamp. Mud sucks at his boots, making walking itself a tedious chore. More than the bother, though, Joel hates the ugliness. "When it rains, everything seems so awful."

Time dragged on endlessly. The lights went on in the village, and the houses took on a cosy look. The street noises were dying down soon. The only sound was that of dogs barking mournfully in the distance. Arshak had still not retuned. The fire died down, leaving a mound of ashes in the fireplace, while the lamb lay on the grass, chewing its cud. Navasard was all ears as he peered into the darkness. His eyes became strained and started to tear, his head felt heavy. He rose, his feet refused to budge. "Why should I go begging to him? I'm older than he is. He should come to me". He began to grumble, but then consoled himself once again by saying: "Well, he's an important man. Maybe he has some important business to discuss with the chairman. He'll come home in the morning". But still, he waited. He waited far into the small hours. The autumn night was drawing to a close. The old man's eyes grew dim from peering intently into the darkness. Slumber gradually lulled him to sleep at the table. He did not know how long he had slept. He was awakened by the neighbour woman's voice calling from the yard. He opened his eyes and was surprised to see the first rays of the sun peeping into the window. "Navasard! Hey,Navasard!" the neighbour called. He rushed out of the house. His neighbour was looking over the fence. "How come you've slept so late today"? "What is it? Is Arshak on his way here"? "No," she said and shook her head. "Your Arshak is leaving.
